

Download Medical School The Interview And The Applicant

The majority of medical schools in this country interview applicants. It is an expensive and time-consuming process. Thus, one can assume that the schools will value what their faculty and students learn about an applicant. The interview process, in many respects, is designed for the applicant as much as the school. I thought it would be nice to create a new one and to have the first ... The medical school interview is a crucial phase in the admissions process. Getting an interview means that the school believes you are, at least on paper, qualified for their program. Unfortunately, good grades and test scores aren't the only predictors medical schools use for their applicants. From challenging pre-med coursework to the MCAT and soliciting recommendation letters, applying to medical school is a marathon-length process. Getting an invitation to interview can feel like a major win -- and it is -- but, you still need to impress the admissions committee.
